AFDCS CHAPTER

The Rochester Philatelic Association has become the latest Chapter of the American First Day Cover Society. Sixty nine is the number assigned the RPA. All RPA members automatically become Chapter 69 members. We have ten to twelve hard-core cover collectors amongst our ranks. This is not to be misunderstood that the RPA has become just a cover club. The RPA is a general club for philatelic collectors of all interests. Just about every collecting interest has its special study groups. Meter mail collectors have the Meter stamp Society, the precancel collectors have the Precancel Stamp Society Inc. and so on. Most national organizations offer chapter memberships to clubs that have a certain number of members with the same collecting interests. The RPA has been a chapter of the American PHilatelic Society for many years. If you have special interests and enough other members have the same we may be able to have chapter association in other national groups.

wonderful holiday Season

How safe is your safe deposit box

by Joseph Arkin

Commercial banks throughout the country offer safe deposit boxes to their customers. A safe deposit box provides a customer with a secured drawer in the bank's vault. The drawer presumably becomes a secure place to store personal valuables, securities, and critical legal documents.

Unfortunately, a safe deposit box provides less security than many people realize. Few banks assume full responsibility for articles kept in safe deposit boxes. And most limit their liability in the event a box holder sustains a loss.

For example, the Union Trust Company of Maryland limits its total liability for any loss to a multiple of the annual rental a customer pays for a safe deposit box. That presently limits the bank's liability to 500 times the annual rental rate.

So, a customer paying $18 per year to rent a box can recover a maximum of $9,000 in the event he sustains a loss. A $30 annual rental rate raises the potential reimbursement from a loss to only $15,000. Such limits place severe restrictions on the recovery an owner can expect from the loss of valuable assets stored in a safe deposit box.

As another example, Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company includes the following clause in its safe deposit box agreements:

"The Box is leased to the Lessee for the purpose of keeping securities, jewelry, and valuable papers only, and the Lessee agrees not to use the Box for any other purpose including keeping money therein. It is expressly understood and agreed that the duty of the Lessor with respect to any such securities, jewelry and valuable papers is limited to the exercise of ordinary care in preventing access to the Box by unauthorized persons, and that under no circumstances shall the Lessor be liable for the loss or destruction of any other property, including money, alleged to have been placed in the Box. Unauthorized access shall not be inferred from loss of any property. The Lessor shall have no liability for loss from fire, water, or the forces of nature, however caused."

Other bank lease agreements have similar wording. Note that the wording restricts renters to using the box to store only securities, jewelry and valuable papers. Yet many renters continue to store gold or silver coins, rare stamps, artifacts, relics, and other items.

The potential problem grows when we note that few banks carry insurance to protect box holders in the event of theft, fire, or explosion. Nor do many banks buy insurance protection against losses from natural disasters such as floods, tornadoes, or earthquakes. Stamp collectors, individually, are able to purchase such protection.

From another perspective, a box holder sustaining a loss enjoys little protection in the event a loss results from a bank's apparent negligence. In such events, the box holder typically must proceed through an expensive litigation process to prove the bank's negligence led to the loss. And experience proves that banks usually win such suits.

Numerous precedents exist. In essence, a bank — as a renter of safe deposit boxes — stands as a bailee for hire — i.e. a caretaker of property. As such, the bank remains obligated only to exercise ordinary care to prevent unauthorized entry.

As a guideline, ordinary care stands as the same care one would expect from an ordinarily prudent and careful person, engaged in the same business. So, a bank usually enjoys adequate defense against negligence suits so long as the methods used to protect its safe deposit boxes conform to those used by other banks in similar communities.

To illustrate, let's look at the case of Webber vs. Bank of San Jose, California. The defendant bank was held not liable for securities lost by burglary of a safe deposit box. The bank building was concrete with 18-inch walls. The vault had steel "fireproof and thief resistant" doors.

In deciding that the bank had used due care and was not liable, the court said:

"The precautions taken by the defendant for the safety of its box renters and the contents of such safe deposit boxes were similar and at least equal to those taken by all other banks in similar communities in California. It would seem that the ordinary care required of a bank in a case like this is that the construction of the bank building and the methods of protection and the general conduct of its business should conform to those in similar communities."

Of course, what constitutes ordinary care varies with the circumstance. And evaluating what constitutes ordinary care remains a question for a jury in each particular case. But numerous precedents indicate that proving a bank's negligence when a loss occurs stands as a challenging task.

As a logical response to these problems, safe deposit box holders must take steps to protect themselves. As one alternative, some insurance companies offer special policies for safe deposit box owners. As another alternative, the holder can inventory the items placed in his box and add a special endorsement to his homeowner's or apartment owner's policy. The inventory typically remains a simple task. And the insurance protection seldom becomes expensive.

In any event, no bank customer can assume that the contents held in a safe deposit box become immune to threats. Natural disasters do occur. The potential for theft remains real. And box holders can't assume that banks exert all the effort necessary to protect them against such losses. □

HERMAN THOMPSON

FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES
STAMPS COLUMN BY BARTH HEALEY SAVING PHOTOGRAPHS

Greg Drake, of Rochester, N.Y., makes a plea on behalf of photograph collectors. The Stamps Column of Aug. 26 discussed revenue stamps used on the backs of photographs in the Civil War era. The stamps represented new taxes that the United States levied to pay for the war.

Mr. Drake collects photographs, and he enclosed photo-copies of the backs of two items from which revenue stamps had been removed, one by steaming, one by scraping.

Naturally enough, he regards this as defacement and pleads with stamp collectors to keep the revenue stamps attached to the photographs.

It was once common for collectors to cut, steam or scrape stamps from envelopes. Count Ferrary, one of the greatest accumulators ever, designed very dense albums with small spaces and even trimmed the margins of stamps to get them to fit.

But collectors have since gained a healthy regard for the integrity of historical documents: envelopes, photographs, even old tobacco tins to which tax stamps are still attached.

Mr. Drake makes another point: the value of a photograph cannot necessarily be calculated from the value of the tax stamp attached.

Sometimes a single stamp was attached to one photograph in a group to show tax paid on all the photographs.

GMF OPEN HOUSE

On Sunday October 28, 1990 the Post Offices General Mail Facility held an open house. The Post Office was educating the public in automation of the postal services. Zip+4, etc. Support groups such as maintenance and the Postal Inspection Service. You wouldn't believe some of the things that are caught being sent through the mails. The Maintenance Dept. was showing off all the high-tech testing equipment. All Postal workers were ready to answer any and all questions.

The kids had a large corner all to them selves and could see many interesting things. They also picked up a few nice items to take home, coloring books were handed out to all the children.

Our own Ray Stone was manning the philatelic window. A total of 4 workers were needed to handle sales of postal related items. T-shirts, puzzles and games seemed to be selling well.

A special pictorial cancel was available and is illustrated below.
